SCOTCH HISTORY.
The Humes, Wedderburns and Other Virginia
Families, Descendants of the Participants, Etc.

A rich and curious growth of tradition and family history is found in the Humes of Wedderburn, the lineal descendant of that renowned Border family, and preserved at Paxton House, at Caldera, and elsewhere, have been explored, catalogued, and classified on behalf of the Historical Manuscripts Commission and the fruits of these labours, while making many precious additions to local and national history might well supply plot and materials for a score of romantic plays and tales of feudal and later times. The "main" of the Humes of Wedderburn, made up of the most part on both slopes of the Lammermuir and along the margin of the lower Tweed—in a word, in the Merse and adjoining portions of the Eastern Marches of the Kingdom where the Humes, and notably those of the profligate and warlike Wedderburn branch, made and kept their place on the Border side by dint of the strong hand. Whether they spelt their names Hume or Hume, the chiefs and retainers of this powerful clan appear to have, as a rule, stood loyally together in war, in love, and even in money matters, and as long as possible they rendered suit and aid to their early overlords of the great House of Douglas, through their marriage connection with whom they could "claim touch with the Royal family of Scotland." So frequently were they called upon to guard the "in country" against the incursions of our "ancient enemies of England," that we find in certain of the charters in the Wedderburn archives that the payment of rent was a conditional matter dependent on the share taken in defence and foray. The earliest of these papers date from the time of William the Lion, and there are family documents supporting the statement of the family historian—David Hume, of Godscroft, brother of the Hume of Wedderburn who, to his own loss, was Comptroller of the Household to James the Sixth—that the first of the branch was "David de Hume," who received the Wedderburn lands as the reward for gallant and devoted service rendered to Archibald, fourth Earl of Douglas, in 1413. Yet we read that not until 1574 had a Laird of Wedderburn the privilege, or otherwise, or dying in his bed. The older lairds were wont to lay them down for the last time in the home of the field, and, in the words of the compiler of the Report, "their first funeral shroud was generally the banner under which they led their retainers to the fight, and which has come down to their descendants stained with their blood."

This banner of Wedderburn was discovered, "in a battered fragmentary, blood-stained condition," in an old strong chest at Wedderburn Castle in 1822. It is supposed to be the self-same flag under which Sir David Hume and his sons—the "Seven Spears of Wedderburn," of Sir Walter Scott's "Laird of Flodden"—fought on the ill-fated field of Flodden in 1513. "It is said to have been wrapped round the bodies of Lairds of Wedderburn; elder and younger, when their surviving retainers bore them home from the field of battle for burial; and not improbably, as tradition goes, it was similarly employed when a like catastrophe again overtook the house of Wedderburn at the Drove of Dunbar, on 3rd September 1650, when again father and son, in this case an only son, and curiously bearing the same name of Sir David and George, fell on the battlefield." Troubles of loyalty, closely commingled with troubles of war in the House of Wedderburn records. The father of Sir David slain at Flodden—himself "killed in an encounter with the English"—was one of the "Bridegrooms of Polwarth." The story of how he and his brother Patrick, ancestor of the Humes of Polwarth, carried away Marjorie, daughter of the Sinclair, the sister-heiress of the laird of Kimermergham and Polwarth, and after the double runaway wedding, danced as gaily around the Thorn Tree, on Polwarth Green, has often been told. But it may be told again, especially as it is seldom that a family side so touched with the chivalric and the tender sentiment finds its way into a paper presented to Parliament.

"It is related that the uncle of the maidens, as heir male of the family and as guardian to them, wishing to prevent these lands being carried out of the family by their marriage, carried the maidens off from Polwarth to his castle of Herdmanston on the other side of the Lammermuir Hills. The young ladies, however, succeeded in conveying tidings of whereabouts to their lovers, who lost no time in summoning their retainers and riding across the hills to their rescue. Inventing the Castle of Herdmanston they demanded their lady loves, who, after some parley on the part of their uncle, were surrendered and with no unwillingness on their part were carried back to Polwarth, where the brothers married them and divided their lands between them."

The grandson of Marjorie, David Hume who succeeded after the Flodden slaughter, was the enterprising Laird of Wed-
